Ways into History: Houses and Homes looks at homes both inside and out and old and new. It explores Victorian homes and houses from the 1950s in particular, and studies the features that make these homes recognisable. It includes a timeline of some of the main inventions and types of homes built in this period at the back of the book.

On these forums, real and would-be burglars debate the best ways to break into a house -- how to quietly break a window, why carding (using a credit card to release a lock) is still the best method and why some still prefer the kick-in-the-door approach. Even retired breaking-and-entering pros chime in with stories of their greatest successes.

Putting your home into trust (along with other assets) is like creating a family bank. This can help and protect many generations of your family. Should you go into care, potentially having your house in trust may enable your family to preserve the value of your home. But creating a trust specifically for that reason will not be effective in our opinion.
